Japan's Yokohama Rubber Co. has obtained company-wide integrated certification under ISO 14001, an international standard for Environmental Management Systems. The certification covers Yokohama's nine locations, including its headquarters and eight production facilities in Japan. Yokohama at each site worked at each site to obtain ISO 14001 certification, a process that started in 1998 and concluded with the head office in March 2007. The company undertook obtaining integrated certification in August 2011. Yokohama said it obtained company-wide integrated ISO 14001 certification in order to realize uniform-quality, high-level EMS under the company-wide environmental policy for the further improvement of environmental management.
